Wordwright: How to Play

Wordwright is a crossword game for 2 to 4 players. Build words on the board from yo tiles; every word you make or extend scores.

Your turn

- Play: put one or more tiles in a single row or column, with no gaps, so they join tiles [redacted]. The very first word must cover the ★ in the middle and use at least two tiles.
- Swap tiles: return some tiles to the bag and draw the same number (only while the bag holds at least 7). You score nothing.
- Pass: do nothing this turn.

To place a tile, tap it on your rack and then tap a square, or drag it there. With a keyboard, move to a square with the arrow keys and type letters. Tap a tile you placed (or press Backspace) to take it back. The line under your rack shows what the move would score before you commit it. Your unplayed tiles stay put while other people move, unless the board changes under them.

Scoring

- Each tile shows its points. A blank (dashed outline) can be any letter you choose and is worth 0.
- Coloured squares count only when you place a new tile on them: 2× letter and 3× letter multiply that tile; 2× word and 3× word (and the ★, which is 2× word) multiply the whole word. Two word squares in one word multiply together.
- Every new word your tiles form counts, including words made across.
- Use all seven tiles in one turn for 50 extra points.

The end

- The game ends when someone uses their last tile after the bag is empty, or after six scoreless turns in a row (passes, swaps, or plays worth 0).
- Everyone loses the points on the tiles left on their rack. If someone went out, they gain all of those points. These adjustments are listed at the end of the game.
- Highest score wins; equal top scores tie.

Table options

- Check words against the word list (on by default) uses the public-domain ENABLE list, plus a few common two-letter words, downloaded once by the group's installation. Turn it off to let players decide among themselves.
- Board changes only the picture. The drawn board follows the table's look; the artwork boards are optional pictures that an installation may leave out.
